

Abstract

The membrane reactor of the present invention generates a desired gas such as hydrogen produced by steam reforming liquid fuels. The membrane reactor provides thermal integration between the heating source and the reaction catalyst by heat conduction through a solid medium. Pressure energy within the membrane reactor provides compression of the feed to lower the partial pressure of product within the reactor, thereby increasing the membrane reactor effect.